DISSERTATION

Dissertation	2019
Title:	“The Double-Bind of Loneliness: David Foster Wallace from the Perspective of Theological Ethics.”
Advisor:	Prof. Sigrid Müller

Abstract: The writings of the American novelist David Foster Wallace (1962-2008) are full of double-binds, problems in which any attempt at a solution to the problem is itself a problem. One of these is rooted in loneliness or isolation on the one hand, and unacceptable attempts to undo loneliness on the other. Wallace describes the horrors of loneliness and isolation in an ever more atomized world. And he describes how the pain of loneliness engenders an impulse to “give oneself away.” This can happen either consciously—as in the attempt to “give oneself” to some cause greater than the self—or (more often) unconsciously in the pursuit of pleasures or excitements to distract—oneself from loneliness. Wallace sometimes calls this giving away of the self “worship.” But most forms of “worship” do not really help to overcome loneliness and isolation. They spiral back to an ever-deeper loneliness. Hence the double-bind between loneliness and “worship” can also be seen as simply the double-bind of loneliness; loneliness as a double-bind. Wallace was not content with describing the double-bind; he also wanted to explore ways of overcoming it. On my reading, Wallace’s work suggests that there is no “solution” to the double-bind in the sense of an insight or practice that would allow one to simply escape. There are, however, ways of living with and confronting the double-bind that partially overcome it or transcend it from within. I argue that Wallace sees these ways as having both religious and ethical dimensions. They are ways of finding an ethics that enables real connection with others—a “giving away” of the self that paradoxically coincides with a finding of the true self. In sketching out such paths, Wallace makes use of theological and religious ideas. I show that Wallace’s work can be an aid to the reflections of theological ethics. He can help theological ethics to escape the ideological trap of serving as one more deceptive easy way out of the double-bind of the human condition. His work can help theological ethics face the human condition as experienced, and to reflect theologically on a truly human way of dealing with it.
